Survey of College Policies in Developing Certificate Programs Primary Research Group Staff, 2016 This study looks closely at how colleges are devising certificate programs to supplement or broaden their traditional course offerings and meet the demand for flexible and lifelong education increasingly demanded by the American public. The report presents data from 35 colleges and two trade associations and helps its readers to answer questions such as: how much are colleges spending on developing and marketing new certificate programs? Who develops the programs? To what extent do they rely on existing coursework? To what degree do they use online learning? What are their enrollment prospects compared to traditional degree programs? In which subject areas have they been most fruitful? How do colleges come up with ideas for certificate programs? How much market research do they do and how confident are they in the data backing up their program development decisions? How much do they spend on traditional marketing venues such as radio and print ads and how much on Facebook, Google and other pay per click ads? How involved are alumni in developing new certificate programs? What role does local industry play? Just a few of the 115-page reports many findings are that: When asked how good the market will be for certificate programs over the next two years, most respondents felt that the market will be good (54.29%) or great (11.43%). More than one-third of the respondents either often or very much so made use of the IPEDS from the National Center for Education Statistics when developing new programs. More than 17% do not use it at all.* Community colleges were more apt than other types of colleges to find current faculty or staff to be useful or a great source of ideas for new certificate programs.* Only 4.63% of certificate courses or programs are completely competency exam based and do not involve human instruction.* Nearly 65% of credits earned in certificate programs could later be applied to degree programs.

The Marketing Value of Graduate Certificate Programs in Higher Education: a Strategic Assessment Susmitha Akula, 2010 The last five years have seen a significant increase in the popularity of non degree graduate certificates. This increase has raised questions about the value of graduate certificate programs from the perspective of students, alumni and industry employers. Do certificate programs provide real world skills and knowledge valuable to industry? Do they serve as effective recruiting tools for the university? Do they provide opportunities for students to meet their professional goals in terms of salary increase, promotions, and the like? The present research is specifically aimed at answering these questions. Surveys that assess perceptions of value of graduate certificates to key stakeholders (students, alumni, and industry) are developed. The results were analyzed from the perspective of current graduate certificate students, alumni and industry employers of the Engineering Management and Systems Engineering (EMSE) department at Missouri University of Science and Technology. Results provide guidance to engineering managers, engineering educators and other engineering professionals on the value added to the workforce by engineering graduate certificate programs. The important results from this study show that students and alumni of the graduate certificate program perceive and agree on the value of the programs, while industry participant disagree. The graduate certificate programs are effective recruiting agents for the Missouri University of Science and Technology. The industry survey reveals a significant point that 45% of the participants are not aware of graduate certificate programs. Sixty five percent of the industry survey participants agree that the students of EMSE at Missouri S&T possess skills necessary to work in real world, however over 95% believe that various skills including soft skills are most essential for a student to succeed in industry--Abstract, leaf iii.

Developing and Delivering Adult Degree Programs James P. Pappas, Jerry Jerman, 2014-02-25 This issue explores the growing field of adult degree programs and considers the theoretical underpinnings of such programs and hands-on issues as curriculum, faculty, marketing, technology, financing, and accreditation, all with a goal of informing and equipping both scholars and practitioners. More and more adults who have been out of school for many years have turned to colleges and universities to complete undergraduate and graduate degrees that will make them competitive in the workforce, fulfill a professional requirement, or enrich them intellectually. Higher education institutions and many private organizations have responded to this demand by creating innovative degree programs aimed specifically at mature learners, students who want to self-design their educational programs and do not hesitate to change institutions if they believe their needs are not being met. This explosive growth in adult degree programs is largely the result of distance education technologies and the Internet. Other significant factors include the potential such programs have for providing additional revenue streams for institutions, the fierce competition from the private sector and other higher education institutions, and the rising interest in interdisciplinary programs. This is the 103rd volume of the Jossey-Bass quarterly report series New Directions for Adult and Continuing Education.

Test Development Melissa Fein, 2012-10-09 Test Development: Fundamentals for Certification and Evaluation provides practical guidelines for the classical approach to test development – specifically for certification and credentialing. Most of the existing high-quality books on the topic of criterion-referenced test (CRT) development are written for professional statisticians and psychometricians. And the books written for the general reader tend to lack accurate, user-friendly coverage of some of the most critical topics. This book serves as an accessible resource on test development that does not require any technical background or expertise. Part I, Conceptual Principles, covers the process of CRT development in narrative form. Some of the topics covered include: defining content domain as related to job analysis and assessment objectives item writing and scoring understanding validity and reliability conducting item analysis defining and differentiating the major standard setting method preparing for and understanding issues with test administration. Part II, the Technical Appendix, contains the computational instructions and supplementary background material. This do-it-yourself manual is a valuable resource for training program developers, credential program developers, as well as other relevant human resources personnel and upper management who need to be on board for change management related to testing programs.

The Guide to National Professional Certification Programs Philip M. Harris, 2001 The job market continues to change. Highly skilled and specialized workers are in demand. Traditional education cannot meet all the needs to create specialty skill workers. Certification provides up-to-date training and development while promoting individual or professional skills and knowledge in a focused manner. Certification as a way of continuing professional education can also be more cost effective.
