The Ends and Objects of Burlington College: An Address, Introductory to a Course of Lectures, Delivered in the Junior Hall of Burlington College (Clas George Washington Doane,2018-01-30 Excerpt from The Ends and Objects of Burlington College: An Address, Introductory to a Course of Lectures, Delivered in the Junior Hall of Burlington College What I say, will be informal, rapid and familiar; suggestive, rather than didactic; from the heart, more than from the head as a man talketh with his friends, as we well feel, that I may talk with you. In what I say, I shall be understood as instituting no comparisons, as casting no reflections, as proposing no discoveries, as claiming nothing as individual or original. If there be any virtue in our plans, it is in their adaptedness to our whole nature, in its moral and its social aspects: if any confidence in their success, it is in the commendation to the hearts of men, which is to come to them from God. The single word, which best expresses all our ways and all our wishes, is the sacred monosyllable, home. To be domestic, first, and then religious blending the two ideas - which God never meant should be disjoined, since He first knit the family bond, in Eden - in that expressive apostolic phrase, a household of the faith, comprises all we count on, for good influence, and hope for, as good result, from Burlington College. The Poet of our times has made the sky-lark the best emblem of our aims and prayers; and said, in two lines, all that we can ever say. We come, your sons, to congratulate you upon the reg turn of this glorious day. To us, it has no common interest. We celebrate, at the same time, the anniversary of the birthday of our country, and that of our College. This day it is, which, more than any other, binds American hearts together and makes them, truly, what they boast to be, a band of brothers. Private differences, party dissensions, all are forgotten, in the general interest. There is no North or South, no East or West. It is America.
