What Veterans Bring to Civilian Workplaces Chaitra M. Hardison, 2017 Veterans have a great deal to offer to potential civilian employers, including valuable nontechnical skills, such as leadership, decisionmaking, being dependable, and attention to detail. However, for civilian employers, understanding what nontechnical skills veterans have received through training, education, and on-the-job experiences can be challenging, because military and civilian workplace cultures and languages can seem radically different from one another. This prototype toolkit is intended to help civilian employers understand the full value veterans can bring to their organizations. It focuses on the nontechnical skills addressed through selected formal military training and education courses and on-the-job experiences that are typical of enlisted combat arms jobs in the Army and Marine Corps. The toolkit begins with a letter that can be sent to employers, explaining the purpose of the other materials enclosed in the packet. The material following the letter is organized into three parts: (1) an introductory section that provides more information on the materials and how to use them, as well as some background on military terms;

(2) descriptions of the specific formal courses selected, discussion of the nontechnical skills addressed in each course, and quick-access summary tables for all courses listing the top skills and competencies addressed; and (3) vignettes that illustrate on-the-job experiences relating to the nontechnical skills that are typical in a select set of combat arms occupations, as well as quick-access summary tables showing the criticality of each skill for performance in those jobs.

Rules of Engagement for the Civilian Job Market Christy Rutherford,2014-08-04 Rules of Engagement for the Civilian Job Market closes the gap in the civilian hiring process and paints a clear picture, giving veterans step-by-step instructions on what they need to navigate the civilian marketplace. Military personnel are accustomed to having manuals, standard operating procedures, rules, and regulations to gain information on the what, why, and how of our jobs. We also rely heavily on each other for proper guidance, but if a mentor was missing, we always had a manual to fall back on. Veterans are certain that if they can adequately manage the mission of the military and survive, then they can certainly achieve anything in the civilian sector. Civilian employers agree, citing that they value the skills that veterans bring to their companies. But, they value the attributes and expertise of veterans and not necessarily the fact of being a veteran. There is a disparity between these two perceptions. There is A LOT of information, a ton of veteran advocates, the government, the media, everyone ringing the alarm on what the nation needs to do and how they should help veterans. The information is not only overwhelming to everyone, but it puts veterans in panic mode if they're trying to replace their income or are starting to lose assets because they haven't found adequate employment. The gap is that there are programs that address what to do (like training in LinkedIn), but veterans don't understand why these things are important. Similarly, veterans attend hiring and career fairs to get jobs and understand why they exist (companies seeking veterans), but veterans are missing how to navigate them and don't understand that companies are looking for the most qualified candidates (what) regardless of whether or not the person is a veteran. If we understood what we need to do and why it's important, and also have someone show us how to do it, the result is success. It's my best intention to use the information from countless studies (why reinvent the wheel?), articles, statistics, experiences with other veterans, and conversations with civilian hiring managers (translated into military language) to clear the smoke and help veterans use who they are to get the jobs they deserve.
